The American Society for Nanomedicine (ASNM) emphasizes the practical translation of nanomedicines from the laboratory bench to clinical benefit. The society's mission is to facilitate research activities towards improved disease prevention, diagnosis, and treatments. Annual meetings provide a venue to catalyze interactions among investigators through sharing ideas, research discoveries, and challenges towards advancing the field of nanomedicine. This year's meeting will highlight innovative applications of nanotechnology in both preclinical and clinical settings with special emphasis on translational nanomedicine. Workshops and educational sessions will offer guidance for scientists facing business, legal and regulatory issues while translating their research findings into clinical applications. Many opportunities will be provided for networking and interactions with leaders in the field. Another highlight of the conference will be a session on nanomedicine's role in addressing the challenges of infectious diseases in global health. This multi-disciplinary conference will offer networking opportunities to physicians, researchers, engineers, ethicists, environmental scientists, intellectual property practitioners, lawyers, business professionals, technology transfer specialists, policy makers, and venture capitalists.
